LineageOS, once the exclusive domain of Android fans, is being expanded to now become a popular operating system for computers running Linux. Linux is a free and open source operating system developed by the GNU project, and many computers running Linux are used to develop both Android and Windows apps. LineageOS is based on the Android operating system, although its image consists of a few tweaks and customization. The biggest benefit that Linux has is that it comes with a lot of desktop software that can be used to manage files, photos, and the device in general. LineageOS does not bundle much, except for the kernel. In fact, the default wallpaper and clock app are the only items that can be found in the Settings, although developers can easily add apps or any other items they like. LineageOS 15.1, the most recent release of this operating system, was just released recently and contains a few new features and improvements. The biggest improvement in the OS is the implementation of the new AMOLED Screen Protector, which can be used to protect your device's screen without any bulk. You can also set an LED pattern for the screen and change the display color for a specific display mode. Lastly, LineageOS 15.1 can now support phones with a less than 2% battery capacity, and will decrease the blue light output of the screen, which can be good news for people with sensitive eyes. How to install LineageOS 15.1 on a computer, if you are not using an Android device: The installation process is fairly straightforward, however, it will require a little set up on your side. The initial screen will guide you through the installation process. If you have an Android smartphone that you are using, it is much easier to install LineageOS 15.1 on your device directly. If you are not rooted, you can follow these steps: Download LineageOS 15.1 for your device and install it The installation process will download about 1GB of data and about 20MB of other software, and will take a few minutes. Make sure you have a USB cable available, because you are going to be asked to connect your phone to your computer via USB for this step. Install TWRP recovery on your computer If you do not know how to install TWRP recovery,
