Q: Dragging and dropping nodes within a treeview I have a treeview and i would like to allow dragging and dropping of nodes. Not only within one level, but all levels. The reason for this is that our client wants to take advantage of the yellow arrow button that appears in one of the node's. The arrow button causes the user to edit a node and when it is finished to save the changes. I think it is possible to get this working in a multi level treeview using the DragDropTreeNode object. But how do i get this to work with the yellow arrow? A: Ok i used the following code to get it working in a multi level treeview. It is not perfect, but works fairly well. The UIKeyTip is used to provide the drag and drop within one level. The yellow arrow is provided by the treeviewdragdrop. public partial class Form1 : Form { private TreeView TV; public static TreeNode FindTreeNode(TreeNode parent, TreeNode targetNode) { if (parent == null) return null; TreeNode current = parent; TreeNode foundTargetNode = null; while (current!= null) { if (current.Nodes.Contains(targetNode)) { foundTargetNode = current.Nodes.First(); break; } current = current.Nodes.Next; } return foundTargetNode; } public Form1() { InitializeComponent(); //set up the treeview and add a few nodes to it. TV = new TreeView(); TV.Dock = DockStyle.Fill; TV.TreeViewItemColl

A: Of course you could use whereNotIn and check if the value is in the database. $total = Something::whereNotIn('id', array(1, 2))->get(); If that isn't really what you want, you could fetch all the items in your table and check if they have the same ID in the database. $total = Something::all()->pluck('id')->whereNotIn('id', array(1, 2))->get(); Pink-cheeked warbler The pink-cheeked warbler (Setophaga fusca) is a small to medium-sized passerine bird in the family Parulidae.
