I'm writing some logging and I want to create a custom class that holds some of my data I serialize to xml. If my custom appender is present it will be added to the xml I generate, but when I serialize the data I want to make sure I can deserialize it back to my custom class. A: The easiest way to accomplish this (and the way I've done it in the past) is to give my logger an optional "setting" field. That way I can store whatever I want in the logger configuration, and it will always serialize to the same format. When I want to deserialize it I can just deserialize the logger setting directly (using XmlAttributeOverrides). that question there is a two part answer. First, suppose that I experience something that I think I could describe as a psychological pain. If I asked others what kind of pain it was they might all have different ideas about the term. The fact is that there are not clear cut categories of what exactly we are talking about when we use this term. Maybe this is a problem not only for terms like pain and happiness but for concepts like mind, soul, and body. The second part of the answer to the first question is that if there is no clear cut category then there is no reason for a system like S to be analytic. It is analytic if there are elements that fit exactly into the category we are trying to describe. So the question is not really if we are using the term correctly or not. Instead, the question is whether we have sufficient reason to believe that the only definition of the term which would be analytic is the one which we put forth. Now it is possible that some other description of the object or function would be better than the one I suggested. But this is a different question than "is the term analytic." Shkliar was not being ironic when he wrote "for the most part we don't even care whether our words are good, or what other people think about them, we care about whether they answer questions we want to ask." This is
