It was a long time ago, but it's a memory that's with me forever. The power of the Stanley Cup was legendary and it was long-awaited moment that forever changed. Join Jim and Mike as they relive the final moments of the Stanley Cup Playoffs. The Canadiens were hosting the Vancouver Canucks in their first-round series. The Habs had been leading the series 2-0. They were tired. The Canucks had home ice advantage throughout. The Canucks had the momentum. The Canucks were hungry. It was Game 3. Montreal won Game 2 by a 4-3 score. Vancouver won Game 2 by a 6-4 score. The Habs were looking really, really good. They were really getting the respect of their fans. And they were looking for Game 3 in Montreal to turn the series around. But the Canucks came out strong. The Habs looked a little tired. They were looking a little listless. Vancouver had the momentum again, but Montreal wasn't playing to their strengths. The Habs just didn't look good. Alex Galchenyuk, a young star on the verge of breaking out, struggled. He couldn't score. He couldn't generate any offense. In fact, for the first time in his young career, Galchenyuk couldn't put up one single point. And Montreal couldn't keep up with the Canucks in the first period. Galchenyuk went scoreless. They allowed four goals. The Habs were not at their best. The Habs didn't look like themselves. The Habs looked a little tired. The Habs looked listless. In fact, for the first time in three years, Montreal was outshot. The Habs were really struggling. At the end of the first, the score was tied, 1-1, Habs-Canucks. Then, just in the nick of time, the Habs turned it around. The Habs re-grouped. They won three straight and the series. And in the process, they won a truly legendary trophy. Vancouver was just too much to handle for Montreal. The Habs took down the Vancouver Canucks 3-1 and won the Stanley Cup.
