Anatomical localization of human body maps in the brain is mapped by magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). Brain maps are so abundant, so detailed and so plastic during development, that we can ask which aspects of body representation are formed or modified by experience and which aspects are hardwired and move in tandem with other aspects. Here we review the different aspects of body maps from a neurological perspective and discuss kinematics and the anatomical and functional connections between body maps in the brain. In particular we discuss five aspects of the human body representation: (i) the global and local structures of body maps and their presence or absence in other species; (ii) the trajectory of the body segments along the central nervous system; (iii) the central mapping coordinates of the body; (iv) the topographic arrangement of body maps in the brain; and (v) the correspondence between the topographic arrangement and the actual body segmental organization and function. In conclusion, we describe future directions of research, including simultaneous localization of body maps in both hemispheres of the brain, extrapolations from work in other species, topographic segregation of body maps and the connection between body maps and motor planning and execution. NACOGDOCHES, Texas (AP) — A police officer who left her toddler at home with her older children is going to prison. The mother of two told police that she was taking a nap when her oldest daughter woke her at about 4:30 a.m. and told her that the toddler was hungry. The toddler was 8 months old, on the cusp of walking. His nose was bleeding. She said she found him crying in the apartment's laundry room. His nanny was gone, and his father didn't know where he was. A Park Hill police officer told police the father of three showed up in a panic. The toddler was fine at the time, but the following day he showed up at the police station with a black eye and a swollen eye. He told police the nanny,
