I have my own class that I need to use a map. All I need to do is use a map of strings to another map. I'm not an expert of lambda expressions, and I don't know how to use it. private Map> dawgs = new LinkedHashMap>(); With this I get an error that I can not use the linkedHashMap. Could someone give me a hint on how to use it? And how do you use it? A: Map is not a functional interface. This might be a reason for the LNK1181 error you're getting. LNK1181: Unresolved external symbol "public: class std::hash __thiscall MyClass::CreateHash(unsigned int,int const,int const)const " (?CreateHash@MyClass@@@QBE?AV?shash@W4MyClass@@@V?shash@W4MyClass@@@std@@@BGTDDBDB@Z) referenced in function "public: void __thiscall MyClass::AddAnimal(int)" (?AddAnimal@MyClass@@@QAEHX@Z) To allow Map to be used in a parameterised method, you'll need a constructor/factory method to be supplied which tells the compiler how to create a map. This constructor needs to be public, final and of the type std::map. It needs to have a signature like public: final std::map< createMap(int size) There are several good tutorials on creating generic objects with lambda expressions. Why is Lambda Expressions and Anonymous Classes so Hard to Understand? Why are lambda expressions for constant methods so annoying? The bigger question, of course, is whether a LinkedHashMap is what you actually want. Probably not, as 648931e174

If you are using Visual Studio, you can put the line in the project settings. Radical options for treating breast cancer. Breast cancer is an important public health problem, and new treatments are constantly being tested in the form of clinical trials. Many modern treatment options for breast cancer have emerged from previous advances in both basic science and clinical practice. We reviewed the data available in the literature on treatment options, including endocrine, targeted, radiation, and biologic therapies. We present various management options in patients with breast cancer and review the current trends in treatment options, looking at the evidence supporting their use.Q: Go to Parent Page after click event I am trying to get a parent page to navigate to the page after i click a link.
