With the continuing and increasing research and application of micro/nanofabrication technology, the manufacturing of devices with submicron or nanometer scale features is more and more mature. As a result, the variety of micro/nanodevices with improved functions and structures is on the rise. Nowadays, various micro/nanoscale devices are widely applied to the integrated circuits, microelectronics, biotechnology, and optics. These devices are used in the fields of military, aerospace, chemical industry, health care, and so on. For example, the fabrication of nanofabrication is the prerequisite of the development of many fields such as microelectronics, nanoelectronics, biotechnology, energy, chemistry, optics, and so on. In recent years, semiconductor manufacturing technology has developed at a relatively fast speed and has already experienced a rapid development. Compared to the conventional micromachining technologies, such as lithography and etching, a simple and low-cost electrochemical fabrication method has the advantages of low cost, high throughput, and no waste of materials. Therefore, the electrochemical fabrication is widely applied to the fields of electronics, optics, and microelectromechanical system (MEMS). Nowadays, the electrochemical fabrication technology has been applied to the fabrication of various devices. For example, the technique of producing trenches or vias for the integrated circuits is developed. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 6,214,924 discloses a method for fabricating integrated circuits by a combination of dry etching and electrochemical fabrication. However, the conventional electrochemical fabrication has a problem of verticality in the line of the trenches or vias. The problem of verticality in the line of the trenches or vias causes the decrease of integration density of the integrated circuits, the increase of power consumption, and the damage of the semiconductor device. Therefore, it is desirable to develop a technique capable of suppressing the verticality problem in the line of the trenches or vias.
