A team of animators then creates a simulation of on-screen player movements based on player movements, and it's these movements that are influenced by the physics engine to make the game more authentic. The aim is to make the visuals and gameplay of FIFA 22 feel as close to life as possible, and the resulting game is the first year of the FIFA series to employ this technology, which is something new for the FIFA series. HyperMotion Technology was used in the most recent FIFA titles, FIFA 17 and FIFA 18. But this year, the new technology is refined and tested with data from real-life player movements. In the opening moments of the EA Play live gameplay, fans had a glimpse of what it might be like playing as a player in an in-game simulation. The animation of Cristiano Ronaldo in real-time was simply sensational. Ronaldo is a player with a laser-like precision of his movements, and as he started his goal celebration, the crowd went wild. In the simulation, Ronaldo's jump was angled slightly to the left, as it would be to the right if you were watching the ball in real time. HyperMotion Technology also means animations are more fluid and reactive, and players' faces have a more realistic expression, something that was made possible by an advanced facial scanning and recognition system. As the camera zoomed in on the faces of top-level footballers, I was able to see just how comfortable they were at the controller of the PlayStation4 or Xbox One. You could see their faces relax, and the lines of conversation stopped. They looked really natural using the controller. A new set of animations called "Post Processing" works in a similar way to photorealism and was showcased via three real-life, high-level footballers. This technology was first seen in FIFA 17, and its aim is to give a new level of detail by creating real-time shading effects such as wrinkles on the players' forehead and face. FIFA 18 also featured some great animations, but this year's animation from this technology is even better. Another thing that's key to HyperMotion technology is that there are no other players on-screen, just the players moving around you. It creates a sense of close-quarter battle in almost every area of the game. Even when players are not in the zone, it'
