Evaluation of a therapeutic pipeline for the control of cutaneous leishmaniasis in Colombia. Cutaneous leishmaniasis (CL) is a neglected, vector-borne parasitic disease caused by the promastigote of a species of the genus Leishmania. The World Health Organization has classified CL as a disease of moderate epidemic potential. In Colombia, more than 200,000 cases have been estimated, and CL is one of the most significant health problems. Although the population impact of the disease remains low, the potential severity is substantial for the population, as it increases the incidence of other infectious diseases such as tuberculosis and HIV. Here, the design, development, and evaluation of a therapeutic pipeline for CL in Colombia are presented. In Colombia, the species of the genus Leishmania responsible for CL is L. (V.) guyanensis, and L. (L.) amazonensis. The drugs used in the pipeline are meglumine antimoniate (Glucantime, Sanofi Aventis), liposomal amphotericin B (AmBisome, Gilead Sciences), and paromomycin (Sparclon, Laboratorios Farfan, Colombia). The purpose of the therapeutic pipeline is to offer appropriate therapeutic alternatives to communities that are not covered by the Colombian leishmaniasis control program. Furthermore, the pipeline will promote research and development in these neglected diseases.

UPS ground transportation vehicles include integrated vehicle tracking systems that provide location information, such as, position and speed information, for ground vehicles. Such integrated tracking systems are described in U.S. Pat. No. 8,511,812, assigned to Carrier Corporation of St. Louis, Mo. The integrated vehicle tracking system determines the position of a ground vehicle by transmitting a signal to the vehicle, which then replies with its position. The signal includes a start bit and a group of digital bits representing the vehicle's location. The integrated vehicle tracking system converts the digital bits to a continuous stream of vehicle position data. The vehicle position data may be relayed to a central computer that determines the location of the vehicle. The integrated vehicle tracking system transmits the position data to a central location, such as a location server, via a communication network. The communication network may be any combination of electrical and/or non-electrical means for transmitting or relaying information. The integrated vehicle tracking system may be in the form of a telematics unit that is embedded in a vehicle to wirelessly communicate with a
