"In the era of eSports, few players truly have the stamina, speed and coordination to go the distance," said Pasi Sahlgrén, the Lead Designer at EA SPORTS. "With "HyperMotion" technology, we've been able to blend player biology with the complex decisions found in real world football, allowing players to possess the physical agility and stamina that translate into incredible fluidity on the pitch." A new motion capture technology known as "MoCap" captures raw data of a player in motion through a series of gimbals and infrared cameras. The data is later separated and analyzed in-game, allowing the game engine to predict the physical and mental movements of the player and deliver authenticity without compromising the technical aspects of realism in gameplay. "Combining motion capture technology with physics technology allows us to deliver on the goal of immersing our player into a real football environment that accurately captures the sport's physicality," added Ian Provost, the Creative Director for FIFA, of game modes. "Whether you're tackling a competitor on the field, managing the defenders who keep you off the ball, or bouncing off a wall or ball to run into goal, the game engine knows where every player is on every pass, every tackle and every recovery."
