p2p hash > hash human Vehicle control systems are becoming increasingly complex with advancements in safety and drive train technologies. Such complex vehicle control systems rely on sensing and computational systems that are capable of monitoring and/or monitoring the operation of various systems on a vehicle, including systems associated with a vehicle's transmission. These types of sensing and computational systems are often embodied as embedded computing systems in a vehicle. In the automotive industry, utilization of off-the-shelf transponder devices is often not an option because of their high cost. An alternative system is desired.Q: Can't set namespace in return statement I can't get this to work using (var root = XDocument.Parse(xml)) { return root.Descendants().Where(e => e.Attribute("local-name").Value=="field").Select(e => e.Attribute("field-type").Value); } The error I get is a namespace for C#1 cannot be an element, but it is. This appears to be a simple misunderstanding with the return statement, but I can't find any example anywhere of how to deal with it. A: That's not the C#1 namespace - you need to provide a namespace for the Descendants() call to find nodes in that namespace. However, if you use the overload that accepts an XNamespace, then you won't need to specify a local-name or attribute-value - you can use Name="@" instead. The syntax: return root.Descendants(). Where(n => n.Name.LocalName == "field" && n.Attribute("local-name")!= null && n.Attribute("local-name").Value == "field-type") .Select(n => n.Attribute("field-type").Value); Note that it's better to use XNamespace.Name.LocalName, but the two are equivalent.
