The more things change...whoever said that just might be right. I did a search for "Lowe's+online" and they seem to be offering the same choices at the same prices that are offered by most brick and mortar Lowe's stores, so at least you could still get them shipped. Doesn't matter to me if they are shipping from there or if you have to go to their store to pick them up, just as long as you can buy them. I was going to do the online store anyway, so I didn't order anything from Lowe's. I did buy a few items from my local Lowe's and they were cheaper than at Home Depot, even with shipping. The past couple of years there's not been a lot of improvement. It seems as though they don't want to change anything that would cost them money. If they're going to offer to print a current list of great deals on the bottom of the catalog, then they should do the same thing for a current list of black friday deals. We met in a conference room in the heart of the facility, just a few blocks away from the famous Blue Room at the Johnson Space Center. The facility was filled with bright sunlight and great spacey conversations. At the end of the afternoon, I had the pleasure of meeting most of the very people who got me where I am. This is the first in a series of posts from my meeting. _____

Launch Pad Develops for the World The Houston Launch Pad is a bionic, multifaceted engineering complex that has historically played host to the development of the launch vehicle used to send the U.S. into space. In the early 1960s, along came NASA, and the 1966 Launch Vehicle Data Book taught hundreds of thousands of engineers how to design, build and launch things into space. The book is still used today by aerospace engineers, and I'll post a bit about it later in this blog. Over the past sixty years, the complex evolved. It began as the first launch facility designed and built by NASA and has gone on to play host to several technological milestones over the years. Currently, it is the only place in the world that the U.S. Air Force can manufacture a reusable sounding rocket, the newest launch vehicle ever designed by NASA and the U.S. Air Force, it's own unique launch vehicle, and it's most recent vehicle technology test facilities. The Houston Launch Pad has been renovated to provide for current and future
