but still done for business I am developing a website for clients that have standard computer science or IT backgrounds and are just using their own computers/servers as their development and testing site.
They have never had an Internet connection and would have no way of knowing how to use something like WebGUI or a FTP client. What is a term that I could use in a sentence or message to describe this state? I have heard user-unfriendly, but I feel like that implies they have some way of knowing how to use the software, but they don't because they don't have any knowledge. I have heard that they're just not savvy, but that term feels like it's being used to describe people who know how to use the software and just decide to learn how to use it. A: Unfamiliar and un-informed A: I've used "Neophyte" on a couple of occasions to describe a new user who was a novice in a particular area, but not totally unfamiliar with the subject. e.g. "The resident is a complete neophyte with media and we have so far been unable to find any way to support him." It is also a real word and carries the idea of being a newbie but doesn't carry connotations of inexperience or laziness. A: How about unsophisticated? OED, cites first use in 1975. experienced in some branch of knowledge or profession but not in others For the IT person, it can probably be combined with more along the lines of unskilled: unskillful, incompetent, inexperienced, inexperienced, unproficient, ignorant, uninformed, or careless or negligent.
