A case of angiolymphoid hyperplasia with eosinophilia (LyE) is reported in a 58-year-old woman. This report is the first in Japan. One skin nodule of the right lower chest was observed 6 years before the present consultation. Neither additional skin lesions nor nerve lesions were found at the initial examination. Histopathological findings of the nodule were typical of LyE. However, no relation of the nodule to blood vessels was observed. The nodule was therefore diagnosed as benign angiolymphoid hyperplasia. Treatment with corticosteroids or melphalan was performed, but the nodule did not regress and recurred three years later. The patient was thus referred to our department for further treatment. The nodule was excised and the histological findings of the excision specimen showed the same features as in the previous nodule. The patient was referred to our department for the further treatment of the recurrence of the nodule. Melphalan was again administered to the patient and the recurrent nodule was totally regressed. To our knowledge, this is the first report of LyE in a Japanese patient. Electric vehicles, or vehicles that are propelled by electricity, are attracting attention as alternative energy vehicles. While fuel cell-powered electric vehicles have been commercially available for many years, the gasoline-powered internal combustion engine is still the mainstream energy source. When compared to a gasoline-powered internal combustion engine, however, electric vehicles have many advantages. For example, a battery in an electric vehicle can be recharged merely by plugging into a wall socket, whereas recharging a battery in a gasoline-powered vehicle requires that the vehicle be connected to a fuel tank and fuel lines, and there is a minimum of around a gallon of fuel in the fuel tank of many
