The Rev. Mark Christensen, chairman of the committee, said the decision to temporarily close the park to all visitors is the result of a careful review that started in December 2016 and ended in October. "In order to avoid any possible harm to anyone while it is being renovated, we feel it is important to limit access," Christensen said. "During this period of time, visitors to Temple Square may continue to use the red Joseph Smith Memorial Building, the Joseph Smith Memorial Building/Beach Concert Theater, the Tabernacle and the Church Office Building." Earlier this year, the committee recommended that visitors be kept out for the entire summer and fall, but state parks officials and temple leaders disagreed. Although there is no actual temple on Temple Square, the space is the focus of Mormons' religious life. The Area Authority on Church Personnel in Utah, which oversees the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Utah, has been updating the dark, underground and midcentury modern-style Joseph Smith Memorial Building since 2013 and completely renovated the Church Office Building in 2018. The $26 million temple renovation was made possible in part by a $5 million donation from the late LDS Church member Thomas G. Fritsche. The $5 million donation gave Latter-day Saints control of the money, and the Utah Department of Parks and Recreation - which manages the park but has no control over the renovations - received no say. As a compromise, the LDS Church agreed to give the church's Utah religious brethren control over the design of the temple. When the renovation was finished, they rejected most of the designs for the temple, preferring the designs created by Fritsche. In the 2018 agreement, the LDS Church controls the final selection of the temple's colors. The temple is being renovated so
