A valid point. I think it's important to emphasize that there are equally valid conceptual reasons why evolution's explanatory capabilities are still not limited to microevolution (i.e. evolution of the species as a whole, and the transition to new species, to name the main forms of macroevolutionary phenomena. These apply to the fundamental processes of evolution too. A valid point. These apply to the fundamental processes of evolution too. However, the fact that we have only conclusive proof that evolution by means of natural selection works at the micro level is a good reason to be skeptical about my conjecture that it could apply at the macro level. However, the fact that we have only conclusive proof that evolution by means of natural selection works at the micro level is a good reason to be skeptical about my conjecture that it could apply at the macro level. I think we need to distinguish between the "macro level" as a concept and macroevolution as a specific process (where it has the same meaning as microevolution today) that happens to be the best explanation of the fossil record. However, the fact that we have only conclusive proof that evolution by means of natural selection works at the micro level is a good reason to be skeptical about my conjecture that it could apply at the macro level. For example, the process of speciation, which is nothing other than the occurrence of natural selection in extreme form, happens only at the micro level. And this is not a good argument against natural selection at the macro level. It is unlikely that natural selection can (or even should) be repeated at the macro level as natural selection happens only in a situation where there is a low amount of variation to select from. On the other hand, speciation at the micro level can be replicated at the macro level. It is very likely that all species that speciated from a pre-existing species did so via natural selection. Therefore, I believe that the concept of macroevolution, when used in the sense that you are proposing, is much more problematic than the concept of microevolution, because it is a conceptual analogue to the common use of the word evolution with regard in all areas of its business. The corporation continues to file 10K's, but the 10K's are often only formaldehyde documents with little or no information. The SEC's request of the 10K's is to ensure they are accurate. What is more concerning is that unless the firm is proactive in filing, an audit will not be necessary. The firm will still have to file quarterly report. The effective ability of the SEC staff to issue subpoenas has become extremely complicated. Firms are deluged with subpoenas from various SEC divisions and are often forced to spend thousands of dollars to procure counsel to respond. The SEC's division of enforcement has become very aggressive and the legislative intent in becoming more aggressive is to encourage the courts to enforce the court orders issued by the division of enforcement. The enforcement staff will attempt to have information produced that was not disclosed in a firm's 10-Q. In order to protect its reputation, the firm has to spend thousands of dollars in legal fees and costs. There is an old saying - "ask them for all the information, they'll either give it to you or destroy it." General Counsel see the SEC as a major customer in the economy. As mentioned before, the SEC is understaffed and underpaid. If the SEC were to suddenly stop accepting new business and fail to pay its debts, the other divisions would be forced to spend significant resources to collect, and the corporation would not be able to file quarterly reports and abide by other legislation. If the IRS were to do the same to the corporation, the corporation would lose its exemption. The responsible, law-abiding firm will prepare its 10-K's and quarterly reports as it always has, but will not sign the 10-Qs. The author is a senior partner in a law firm.
