I'm going to be making some panels for my fort, with walls, and will probably add some doors and other walls to it, along with a roof. I'd like to make sure I can keep the weight down, as my fort is going to be in a forest, and some of the trees are very heavy. So, is there a material that can be put in such a way that it's less than 10 gauge, but thicker than the walls around it? A: You can do that with plastic sheeting. The material should then be 100% polyethylene, which is an even number of grams per meter, so any thickness should work. It's pretty light, is used in home construction, and you can get it at quite reasonable prices. Surgical approaches to pedicle screw
