Camera & Image Editing Digital cameras and digital photo editors have a real symbiotic relationship. It's easy for a camera to produce images in any number of formats. But it can be time-consuming to process those images, so most cameras convert the images into a file that's easy to edit with the camera's own editing features and then crop and resize the image so it fits the space available for the photo on your editing software. In addition to crop and resize tools, a digital camera usually includes adjustment tools that can be used to lighten, darken, and contrast-correct an image. These tools are usually located on the camera's viewfinder or in the menu system. Most digital cameras offer more advanced editing options, such as image retouching with cropping, rotation, and repair. In recent years, compact digital cameras have made it even easier to edit photos digitally. Some digital cameras offer built-in editing software, so photo editing can be done directly on the camera instead of downloading the image to a computer first. For those photographers who prefer editing on a computer, most digital cameras include some kind of editing software. What's common among most digital cameras is a picture-management (PICT) program that works as the program for the camera.

There are two class of agents (i.e. head-up display indicators) which may be used to effect a vehicle-determined time of day. The first type of agent, which is essentially a character, can be fixed, i.e., mechanically attached to a vehicle, and can be installed in the vehicle at the time the vehicle is manufactured. The second type of agent is a device which can be removably attached to a vehicle and which can be programmed for vehicle-determined time of day. The programmed device can be removed from the vehicle and stored in the vehicle at the time the vehicle is first purchased. The programmed device can be installed in the vehicle when it is first purchased. Examples of such a device are described in U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,651,356; 4,654,822; and 4,656,605. The programmed device will require a clock head, a display, and a means to store the desired programmed time. The display is used to display the current time. The clock head is programmed to store the desired time at which the device should display. The clock head is usually powered by a battery pack, and is generally electrically wired directly to a printed circuit board. An example of this type of device is illustrated in FIG. 1. One problem with such devices is that the programmable display and clock heads must be attached to the vehicle and be wired to a printed circuit board at the time the vehicle is manufactured. This can be a complex, time-consuming and expensive process. This is particularly true when the programmed device is to be used for an extended period of time. Another problem with such devices is that, when the programmed device is attached to the vehicle, the electronic circuitry associated with the device must not interfere with the operation of the various electrical components of the vehicle (e.g., the radio, seat controls, ignition switch, etc.). In addition, the wiring that is used to carry power to the various electrical components of the vehicle must be protected from the elements (i.e., rain, dust, snow, dirt, etc.). In addition to this, the vehicle wiring harness may be subjected to mechanical shock due to an impact to the vehicle. Such mechanical shock can be caused by, for example, being hit by a vehicle traveling at an oblique angle to the vehicle. Such mechanical shock can also occur when a vehicle is in an accident. An example of a programmed device which is adapted to meet the above requirements is [Cutaneous manifestations of Guillain-Barré syndrome]. Guillain-Barré Syndrome is an acute polyradiculoneuritis of the peripheral nervous system that may sometimes be accompanied by cutaneous involvement. We report four cases of Guillain-Barré Syndrome, focusing on the clinical and evolutive features of the cutaneous involvement. The pathophysiologic process of Guillain-Barré Syndrome is well known, but whether the severity of the neurological and electrophysiological disturbance is linked to the expression of the skin is unknown. The association of Guillain-Barré Syndrome and cutaneous involvement should be sought systematically. Tectal peristalsis is not involved in tilt-induced or vestibuloocular reflex-mediated compensatory head turns in awake fish. We studied how head, eye, and body movements are coordinated during compensatory head turns after a 1-min full-body exposure to either a whole-body rotation (ambient forward, backward, left, right, upside down) or a sinusoidal rotation (0.1 Hz, +/- 30 degrees peak-to-peak, 1 min) in four groups of the clawed toadfish, Xenoprygion rex, while recordings of neck muscle activity and eye movements were made. Compensatory head turns were triggered by a transient head tilt and could be elicited only during large whole-body or sinusoidal rotations (0.3-1.8 Hz) in which whole-body and eye movements had been previously driven by vestibuloocular reflex (VOR) stimulation. We recorded neck motor activity in the in-phase and out-of-phase relationship with the head and body and calculated the percentage of time spent in which neck muscle activity varied in the pattern of the head and body movements. The percentage of time was used as an index of the intensity of the neck muscle activity. Percent of time was 0-80% in intact fish, 0-20% in ampullary-sectioned-only fish and 30-50% in ampullary-sectioned plus semicircular canal-sectioned fish. The percent of time in the in-phase and out-of-phase relationship during the initial head turns (0-1 min) was equal in intact, ampullary-sectioned-only and ampullary-sectioned plus canal-sectioned fish. During the subsequent compensatory head turns, percent
