While investigating the response of lactating rat mammary glands to estrogens, the authors have shown that this organ is more sensible to some of their effects than the ovaries or the uterus. At first, it can be observed that estradiol as well as progesterone inhibit the lactating mammary gland adenylate cyclase activity; as to the dibutyryl cyclic AMP levels, this effect is more significant with the former. The addition of a tritiated estradiol, recently introduced by the authors, shows that the hormone is bound and retained by the mammary gland, with a half-life of 6 hrs. Other investigations on the induction of mammary lipomaturation by estrogens are also reported.Research progress of vascular smooth muscle cells in the treatment of diabetes and its complications. Diabetes mellitus has been one of the serious complications of human society. Vascular smooth muscle cells (VSMCs) are the main component of the vascular media. Abnormal behaviors of VSMCs are involved in the initiation and development of diabetic complications. In recent years, more and more researches focus on the treatment of complications associated with diabetes by therapeutic drugs that target on VSMCs. The available reports suggest that the treatment of diabetes and its complications by targeting on VSMCs will involve not only the regulation of anabolic function and anabolic signaling pathways, but also the inhibition of catabolic function and catabolic signaling pathways. This review mainly focuses on the characteristics, pathological mechanisms and therapeutic targets of VSMCs in diabetic complications. This review introduces the methods, characteristics, pathological mechanisms and therapeutic targets of VSMCs in diabetic complications.BioFilter, in its most basic form, simply allows fish to "breathe." An open-air-sealed container, through use of air-skimming mechanisms, provides oxygen to the water column, as opposed to being dissolved in the water column. The fish are allowed to swim freely, which keeps them suspended in the water column, resulting in higher oxygen saturation than if the fish were restricted to a tank. Some BioFilters are used as decorative items, and most are not intended for commercial use. Though BioFilters can be made in a few different sizes, all come with a canopy made to

The endometrium exhibits circadian rhythms in several physiological and patho-physiological conditions. An understanding of the molecular mechanisms underlying its rhythmic activities is important for optimising the treatment of many pathologies of the female reproductive tract. The molecular clockwork is composed of a network of genes that ultimately leads to rhythmic expression of target genes. The two clock genes c*- and b*- (clock genes) have been widely studied and are known to play an important role in maintaining circadian rhythmicity. However, little is known about the expression profile of the clock genes in the human endometrium. The aim of the present study was to investigate the expression of the clock genes c*- and b*- and to determine whether the expression of clock genes is involved in the rhythmic expression of target genes in the human endometrium. Both RNA and protein expression levels of c*- and b*- were assessed in freshly collected endometrial tissues from 16 healthy women of reproductive age and from 6 women with endometriosis. In addition, a number of mRNAs known to be involved in the endometrial clock were examined, including TSHR, TBP, ARNTL and PERI.

Immunohistochemistry was used to assess the extent of clock genes in the endometrium and to determine the localization of TSHR. No significant difference in the expression of clock genes was observed between the reproductive age group and the endometriosis group. There were no statistically significant differences in the RNA and protein expression of clock genes in the different stages of the cycle. Overall, the findings indicated that the expression of clock genes in the endometrium is not rhythmic and is not associated with the temporal variations in the expression of target genes
