Story highlights "Thugs, looters, rioters, they're out on the street right now," Trump said "We cannot accept any more lawlessness and lawlessness must come to an end," he added Washington (CNN) Donald Trump on Sunday maintained his aggressive stance against protests that have occurred amid the 2016 election, accusing his opponents of either "beating up or dividing people" or trying to "do a number on" his supporters. Speaking with "Fox News Sunday," the Republican nominee accused "very, very violent" protesters of committing crimes in Charlotte, North Carolina. "Thugs, looters, rioters, they're out on the street right now. It's a horrible, horrible thing to watch," he said. "I don't know why the police are not being strong enough. Rather than admitting that Intel engaged in activity that would have given it a US$1.1bn trade advantage, it now insists that its actions did not prevent actual takers of Intel CPUs from getting the CPUs for free. For some reason, this is somewhat of an important distinction to the United States government. The DOJ's unclarity comes from an unclear version of its case against Intel, which is focused on the company's decision to power its CPUs with a trusted execution engine and
