In this interview, EA SPORTS senior gameplay engineer Austin Marriott reveals how the HyperMotion technology's data is used to customize player attributes, generate power ratings, and to create the new type of artificial intelligence in FIFA on all platforms. Motion capture technology has been around for a long time. What is the added value of the technology in your opinion? Austin Marriott: We've been using data to create gameplay for a long time now. On the Xbox 360, we use data to generate the in-game physics, and for the PlayStation 3, we use data to create the gameplay. All of this data has been generated through motion capture technology in the past. It's a great tool because the data is clean, easy to quantify, and can be used to create great visuals. With FIFA 20, we created a new kind of player movement and animation using the data that we collected from motion capture suits worn by dozens of players during a live, high-intensity football match. Now, we're taking data collected from a complete football match and applying it to a new and improved range of animations and player models in FIFA on Xbox One, PlayStation 4, Xbox 360, PlayStation 3 and PC – a completely new gameplay experience. This is the first time that players have ever been able to move and react on the pitch as real players do. In game, you're going to see more realistic players and collisions, more detailed stamina, and all the player-specific animations seen in real-life. To create these animations, we used player data collected from more than 400 hours of live, high-intensity football matches from the Puskas Award-winning Colombia-Brazil 2014 World Cup Qualifier. We then put it into a deep-learning neural network, which converts this data into an animation and movements at a subconscious level. This was all done in four months of development on Fifa 22 Cracked 2022 Latest Version, and the result is unbelievable. Can you tell us the secret to the AI's newly developed "tactical awareness?" Austin Marriott: The AI engine is a foundation of any FIFA game, but FIFA 20 introduced a new type of AI in that the AI players understood that they were performing poorly when they played the game. For example, a player might go down on the pitch because he made a bad pass in the midfield, and the AI would pass around that player's body for a bit, before passing

Features Key:

- FIFA 22 Championship Kits, the all new Champions League Kits, the new contract system allowing new signings effect things all around the pitch, as well as a whole host of new small details making it the most complete football title ever.
