Preventing email loopback I have a small team, and people regularly pass around domain names. Recently I've bought a domain from a third party, and set up email forwarding such that when someone emails my company address, the email is forwarded to the correct address. What I am asking is: how do I prevent this from happening in the future? how do I prevent my email address from being spammed? how do I prevent my own address from being spammed? A: The trick is to leave the domain name (and the emails) elsewhere. That's what mailchimp did, and they get rid of the "problem" by leaving the domain out of the e-mails. Of course they have to make sure their spam filter won't flag all emails to the domain name. The "domain" might be your own internal server or something that you bought from a domain registrar. If you just leave the domain name out of the e-mails, then everybody can forward them, they don't have to know the domain name. Edit: Spam filter should be easy enough to design, as long as it uses the same domain as the emails. Some don't, though (I don't know the details). Regarding "my own address"... I believe the standard practise is to use reverse DNS lookup. [Hypertension and risk factor of cardiovascular disease in an elderly Chinese population]. A questionnaire was used to collect the demographic characteristics, disease history, dietary intake and life style. An anthropometric and clinical evaluation were performed for all subjects. Biochemical profiles were tested. The physical examination was performed including electrocardiography and echocardiography. A total of 600 subjects

A home visit programme was studied as a potential means of decreasing potential adverse effects of therapy in a group of physically disabled, aged geriatric patients. The programme aimed to evaluate whether home visits at the time of the administration of medications could be an effective and economical means of controlling potential adverse drug reactions of home-dwelling elderly patients. Effectiveness of the home visit programme was evaluated in seven geriatric patients who were receiving 15 different medication regimes. The visit was followed by a telephone call by the general practitioner at least 1 week after the medication had been given. These cases illustrate that the visit was an important factor in the control of potential adverse effects of the therapy. Medications were changed in five cases (40%). The intervention did not influence the outcome in the remaining patients. Information about adverse drug effects was provided in six cases, indicating that oral medication was probably the cause of a reaction in two patients. Adverse effects after injection therapy and tube feeding were not evaluated. The visit programme appeared to be very well accepted by the patients and their families. The home visit programme was shown to be an effective and economical way of decreasing potential adverse effects of medication in some patients.Q: Como criar estilos para Android?
