The aim of the study was to search for a relationship between the presence of diabetes mellitus and the presence of microorganisms in the bone cement implanted in patients of average age at the time of the second surgery. To this end we selected 45 patients, who underwent revision arthroplasties after having undergone the initial prosthetic treatment in our department and who had had the cement implanted in the interval between the two surgeries. None of the patients had had a prior infection of the index operation site, and none had received antibiotic treatment before implantation of the bone cement. The specimens of cement were sent for quantitative bacteriological examination, and the patients were treated with antibiotics during the post
