The melatonin-synthesizing enzyme arylalkylamine N-acetyltransferase (AA-NAT) is located in the suprachiasmatic nuclei (SCN), the structures believed to regulate circadian rhythmicity. Mice lacking AA-NAT have behavioral rhythm disturbances, and retinal glutamate levels that are higher than normal. Retinal glutamatergic receptors have been shown to control intraocular pressure (IOP). The goal of this study was to examine whether timolol, a glaucoma medication, affects AA-NAT-deficient (AA-NAT(-/-)) mice as compared with wild-type mice. Effects on IOP were also evaluated. Using a laser-assisted tonometer, the authors determined the effects of timolol on

AA-NAT(-/-) and wild-type mice. After timolol treatment, IOP increased in both AA-NAT(-/-) and wild-type mice. The increase in IOP was higher in AA-NAT(-/-) mice, suggesting that AA-NAT deficiency causes a resistance to the ocular hypotensive effect of timolol. The higher IOP in AA-NAT(-/-) mice was associated with an increase in glutamate levels and a lower retinal sensitivity to stimuli in response to glutamate agonists. AA-NAT deficiency may affect retinal glutamate neurotransmission and thereby alter the regulation of IOP. The absence of AA-NAT in the SCN could be involved in the genetic modulation of IOP.Office of Fellowships and Academic Affairs The Office of Fellowships and Academic Affairs manages the academic and financial benefits that American universities extend to
