Work of the presently named inventors, to the extent it is described in this background section, as well as aspects of the description that may not otherwise qualify as prior art at the time of filing, are neither expressly nor impliedly admitted as prior art against the present disclosure. Graphical user interfaces (GUIs) for applications running on computing devices, such as mobile phones, have become more prevalent as the use of these computing devices has increased. For example, some mobile phones have been implemented as a smartphone that includes a GUI and a touchscreen display. The touchscreen display may be used in combination with a motion, inertial, and/or touch-based controller. As a result, a user of a computing device, such as a smartphone, may interact with the computing device, as well as other computing devices, using the display and controller. For example, the display and controller may be used to provide a menu of computing device applications and/or other functionality of a computing device, such as an Internet browser. However, when one or more windows open on the GUI during use of the GUI, it can be more difficult for a user to interact with and/or control the open windows. For example, the open windows may block access to the touchscreen display and/or may increase the size of the GUI. In addition, it may be difficult to interact with the open windows, such as by selecting, clicking, scrolling, etc., as the user is required to interact with the open windows on the display in order to interact with the GUI. In some computing devices, a user may switch between a first application and a second application and may lock focus on the second application. For example, focus can be locked on the second application in order to block interaction with a first application. However, the user may not always be able to lock focus on the second application and a first application may continue to take focus. For example, when the user is attempting to scroll the GUI on a touch-based controller, the user may miss a scroll control on the GUI due to focus that has been locked on the second application. Accordingly, a solution for providing focus to a user interface would be useful.
