Companies in Silicon Valley have converted offices into homes. But not everyone has been able to easily adopt telecommuting. Why? There are many reasons. But one important barrier is a lack of broadband Internet access in most parts of the country. That's why AT&T is so excited about its latest effort to offer rural broadband to five million new users. The new service is available in 31 states, and plans include a basic home Internet service. It's called AT&TNet. The new service will not be the first option available for Internet service providers to cover more rural areas, but AT&T hopes that it can help speed up development in the future. "It's about providing what we think are best, most efficient ways to develop services, especially around broadband," said Ronan Dunne, AT&T vice president of corporate technology. Dunne said that AT&TNet offers an all-digital Internet connection that offers download speeds of 10Mbps. The new service is available to customers in central Illinois, Kansas, Nebraska, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Texas, West Virginia and Wyoming. Dunne said it's one of the "most ambitious offerings" that AT&T has provided in recent years.

The company is working with the Federal Communications Commission to push through a plan that would boost Internet service access
