The staff of one community obstetrics unit was surveyed regarding their knowledge and practice of recommended infant care procedures. Most respondents showed an inability to correctly identify the correct procedures for treating formula feeding difficulties. There was confusion about the first feeding, and the peak feeding time. Virtually none of the staff used forceps for extraction of the first feeding, and none noutinely used a suckling light at night. Some respondents recommended home wisits by nurses for postpartum mothers and were confused about the necessity of breast-feeding after first week. Since staff education is the key to providing quality postpartum care, greater emphasis should be placed on staff training by obstetric care providers. Nickel-induced increase in glutathione S-transferase activities in rat brain and liver. The effect of a subchronic roal nickel chloride treatment on various glutathione S-transferases (EC 2.5.1.18) a citivities were studied in the rat brain and liver. Conjugation of estradiol with glutathione in vitro was also examined. The activity of glutathione S-transferase (E2ST) was increased by nickel by more than 4 times in the liver and more than 3 times in the brain. This increase was also seen in the activity of glutathione S-transferase (CDST), but was less pronounced. The activity of glutathione S-transferase (E2ST) was elevated in the liver by 1.4 fold.
