Domino effect A domino effect occurs when a small action has a major impact. It was used in the 1950s for introducing computers to the general public, as a way of explaining a modern multi-user computer system. The term has been applied to a wide range of events, including: A feature of many technical magazines, such as PC Format, referring to the fact that readers are easily drawn into buying more magazines from the publisher when a magazine on their favourite topic is published. In graph theory, a domino graph or domino network is a large graph where each node has more than one incident edge, and when starting at any node, a directed path exists to every other node. The size of a domino network is normally defined in terms of the total number of nodes, and the number of edges, and not the number of vertices. In the military, a "domino" is a device which starts a chain reaction of detonation. A chain reaction is a cascading series of events that leads to a larger and more major result. Within the social sciences, the analysis of impacts of experiments on data sets. Origin The term, although having existed for many years before its current use, was popularised in the 1950s when computers were first being mass-marketed to the general public. Computer systems One of the earliest uses of the term was in the presentation of the first commercial minicomputer, the ILLIAC. When he used a slide of the ILLIAC to demonstrate its characteristics to a group of business people, he caused a domino-effect effect of breaking down into what soon became known as the "IBM effect": whereas every service business would be using computers, all in the same company and in the same language, it also gave rise to the clone effect that made it possible for the business world to quickly adapt to new services and prices with a high degree of technological homogeneity. In his book A New Kind of Thinking, the psychologist Eric von Foerster described the effect of the introduction of the ILLIAC at UCLA in 1951. In the gaming industry, the term 'domino effect' has become widely used in the non-profit press for referring to the large-scale swarming of events, such as large-scale server outages or large-scale hacking, which result in large-scale changes to the gaming infrastructure.
