SyncScribe Review: SyncScribe Review by Brian New screen capture tool from Cyberlink Review Date: May 31st, 2007 Introduction CyberLink's Screenshot utility was one of the first screen capture utilities to make it to the market, and although the name would lead you to believe this is a pretty basic tool, the application is really quite powerful. I have written in the past about the need for a good screen capture application, and this software is definitely one that has shown its worth, its latest release has brought some really interesting new features that elevate the utility beyond what you might expect from it. ScreenCapture even allows you to import and export photos, that is, any picture file that you can take with your camera or scanner, so you can import pictures directly from your memory card. There's also the ability to take a screenshot of a full screen as well as specific portions of a screen, with all of these tasks being done with the press of a button. If you're looking for a way to quickly and easily capture screenshots, then I highly recommend you give Cyberlink's Screenshot a try.

Interface The Screenshot utility has a pretty straightforward interface. The interface is fairly standard, with two main windows; the first is the main window which handles the capture of the screen and any buttons are at the top right of the main window. The bottom right of the main window contains a button labelled "Capture", which is how you fire off the screenshot capture. When you press the Capture button you will be presented with the dialog below, where you can select from a variety of options, such as including or excluding items on the screen, including a time stamp etc. On the bottom right of the main window is a "Save" button, which you use to save the file you have just captured. This main window also contains buttons that you can use to see things that you've captured and to select particular area for the screenshot. Pressing the "Screen
