The iframe is used to display images in the blog. They show up correctly. I can't seem to understand why I can't get the images to reflow automatically. Every time I add an image from a picture, the picture doesn't reflow automatically. I've also tried the API method but that doesn't work. Could someone explain to me why this is happening or what I am doing wrong? A: You can use Chrome Dev Tools and inspect the elements and look at the styles of the element. To reflow, the element has to be a block-level element with some width set

Reviews: Check out PC Pitstop PC Pitstop is one of the most popular software development companies that offers reliable tools for all kinds of computers and mobile devices. The main focus of the company is to provide users with software that is good in quality and suits their needs. PC Pitstop is not just another regular developer. The team behind PC Pitstop is well known for providing Windows and Mac tools, optimization software, and even specialized products that are worthy of being purchased. Publisher Description: PC Pitstop Optimize is one of the tools designed to optimize computer settings and increase the overall performance and Internet speed. The first thing you shall notice once installation comes to an end is the well-developed interface that guides users throughout the whole optimization job. It all comes down to a wizard, which means rookies should encounter absolutely no problem given the fact that they only need to follow a few steps to successfully optimize the system. First, they are asked to choose the connection type and the rated download speed, while the next step scans the system and detects the current settings. Junk files and Internet settings are then brought in the spotlights for an in-depth analysis, while startup programs, registry fixes and performance tweaks are the final steps of the optimization process. As you can see, PC Pitstop Optimize comprises multiple system settings, so it's recommended to pay attention to every single option, just to make sure you take advantage of all its features. In case you need assistance, you can always check the help section and go over to the official page of the developer where you shall find a wizard-like help manual. An Internet connection is, of course, needed. PC Pitstop Optimize indeed optimizes the system and in case you have a very slow machine, the application does a great job to repair the problems. On the other hand, it doesn't do much good on a stable system, so it only comes down to tweaking some Windows settings rather than boosting the overall performance. As a conclusion, PC Pitstop Optimize is worth a try, although it still needs a few enhancements.
