condition I would like to remove all the value from a list using any condition. Let say I want to remove all the values I meet the condition.
So I want to delete all the item which correspond to a certain value without need to get and delete each one of them. I have: [u'f', u'e', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f'] Then I want my list to be: [u'e', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f'] Any ideas please? A: You can use a set: a = [u'f', u'e', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f'] b = set(a) print(b) # {u'e', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f'} print(a - b) [u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f', u'f'] You can also use a list comprehension, although it would make the list elements tuples: l = [u'f', u'e', u'f', u'

The next time you get into a side scuffle with a drunken stranger, think of this: on March 21, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration will make it easier for airlines to start enforcing their policies that make passengers pay more for lost or damaged bags. The policy, which bans an airline from charging for lost or damaged bags weighing more than 10 pounds, won't affect the airlines the way it will affect consumers. It won't necessarily make flying more expensive or limit travelers' bag options; it will just make the airlines be consistent. But the policy's companion regulation, which bans airlines from charging for overweight bags, could have a broader impact. "It's difficult to see how the airlines aren't going to raise prices because of this," says New York University's Edward Snyder, a transportation economist. "If you can't charge more for something that's a financial liability, then you're stuck with no place to put the money." Even when airlines keep their pre-Crisis baggage pricing, Americans don't say they're pleased. According to a 2012 survey from market research company OnePoll, American and Delta Airlines were in the top three airlines to people as not being affordable—meaning they cost too much. And now, it's getting harder for the airlines to keep their bag prices low 648931e174

NEW: Introducing an innovative approach to the replication of vascularized tissue constructs within a 3D-bioreactor. Tissue engineering is the new frontier in regenerative medicine. A major challenge is to create multiple tissue types or organs that can be used to replace lost or damaged tissue. The need to construct vascularized, functional tissue constructs has traditionally been met with the use of scaffolds. However, this approach requires a number of surgeries prior to implantation, and tissue-engineered constructs remain physically isolated from the host tissue. The clinical and industrialization of tissue engineering is presently underdeveloped. This is due to the requirement for a heterogeneous collection of cells, scaffolding and three-dimensional (3D) culture to support the regeneration of tissue. The present work describes a simple method to engineer 3D tissues within a 3D-bioreactor. To achieve this, a bioreactor was developed to generate a fluid flow and provide mechanical stimulation. The bioreactor is compatible with different cell types and can be controlled to allow for the creation of an extensive range of clinically and industrially relevant vascularized tissue constructs. This work demonstrated the ability to consistently manufacture multiple tissue types in a highly complex environment within a short timeframe. Fibre optic distribution systems are known for providing various kinds of data communications services to a building. For example, such systems are used to provide telephone and television services to business and residential customers. In a typical fibre optic distribution system, incoming fibre optic cable is fed into a distribution hub which is connected by “drop” cable to the buildings of the subscribers. The drop cable in the hub is usually in the form of a fibre optic patch cable which can be managed to branch out from the hub to any of a plurality of buildings. The drop cable then terminates in a “cable termination” which is attached to the drop cable junction box. In recent times, fibre optic communication services have been increasing in popularity and the demand for such services have been increasing. With the increasing popularity of such services, there has been a desire to provide more and more options for such
