History The first under-age football team in Australia was the 1908 Summer Olympics football team, which at the time was the highest level of team that Australia could enter. A team representing Australia at the 1908 Olympics had been the norm ever since the Australian team was formed in 1884, with the exception of 1899 and in between, when there were no national side due to the lack of an organised football code, and Olympic Games football at that time was played under the laws of rugby union. In 1913, the Football Association of Australia (the first organisation to administer the game of football) was created, a few years before the declaration of the Empire Games. The Football Association began setting up national sides, which would represent Australia at international tournaments and which Australia could send to the Olympic Games as part of the national team. To this day, under the Oceania Football Confederation, which was formed in 1974, Australia is in Group A. In the years following the Football Association's formation, the club-based circuit dominated football in Australia and the national sides were the creation of the amateur football clubs. The first international games that the national sides took part in were hosted by New Zealand in 1938, but Australia hosted the second international for the Under-14s in 1959 against New Zealand. Although Australia hosted the second game, the first international game since the Second World War was not until the next year, when the young Australian side hosted South Africa in 1963. The Australians hosted New Zealand in 1963 and the next year hosted Greece for the first time. The Australia national under-17 side won the 1987 FIFA World Youth Championship in Chile after defeating England by penalty shoot-out in the semi-final, and went on to defeat hosts Chile in the final. The
