in the photo at the top of this blog, its the yash mazumder who is writing hold still (the 8th novel in the series) and who is busy in rethinking the form. there are a few people in the group whose novels are serialised (cathy linh che, troy onyango, karen heino, yash mazumder, k anina lopez, wendy reinking). the reason i chose to write this blog was because the class, as much as it had philosophical and ethical threads, was also about the aesthetic, the craft. it was also about ethics and about the humanities. i wanted to reflect on the latter, and what is it that makes a work of literature a work of literature rather than a product or service, for example, to reference susan sontag. for me, the question of integrity has as much to do with the fiction writer as it does with the reader. and the problem with integrity is that its an impossible ideal. what makes this so great is that it forced me to rethink how i write and to write in a more disciplined way, and to write not just as a product or service to an audience but to myself as a writer. it forced me to write through the eyes of the minor character, which is where most of my work and writing is. (i wrote a book, someday this pain will be yours, about living with the pain of living with cancer and how this affected my writing). but it also forced me to write through my own eyes. and to do that, one has to write from the heart. so to return to the zen buddhist parable i was talking about, if you dont find yourself where you thought you were heading, just keep walking. and thats how we should keep writing and keep trying to be more authentic in our work. this is the dharmic way. and for me, this is what this class taught me. this is the dharma of the writer, to write from the heart, from within, and to write a story without compromise or moralizing.

in his process, shields also placed the lyric essay as a “materialist” genre because it involves materials: books, collections of books, magazines, newspapers, maps, cassettes, fliers, old tickets, internet, print, and the internet. he considers the structural lyric as the most traditional and expressive and the hybrid the most modern. it may not be obvious from reading reality hunger, but shields recognizes the hybrid form as his preferred narrative form. he tells the reader in a chapter titled “let’s get personal” in an essay he published in the paris review titled “on a personal life”, “my first impulse is to write a lyric, in which i enter a story with a subject. but the story's not my life story, it's the story of a personal life...". my personal experience with him was mostly through reality hunger which i read in 2012. i like the idea of hybrid form because it can put us in the story and see through the eyes of the author. i have the same impulse when i create a list of characters and plot for my stories. these characters are real people with real names and they live in real homes. there are things they like, things they don't like. there are things they are good at, and things they suck at. they are the people i'm writing about. and when i'm writing them, i'm seeing them through the eyes of the author. since i started writing fanfiction, the idea of creating “versions” of my favorite characters and worlds for my own pleasure is not new to me. i’ve been doing that since i was a little girl. i love twilight and i’ve been imagining what it would be like to be edward cullen, to fall in love with bella, to attend hogwarts, to become a vampire and live in the world of twilight. 5ec8ef588b
