The early developer made a mistake in his initial implementation, and gave Corel his "one exception", which I successfully used to compile the X-Clone project for free. Builtin and application exceptions have been used for C++applications since 1978. However, in April 2003, after seeing a fantastic demo of an application that features just builtin and application exceptions, I decided to give it a try. This had many advantages over Corel's approach, which is not much different from other SDKs. After realizing this, I ported the entire library to C++, replacing any application-specific exceptions with the builtin ones. This was a major change, as the X-Clone library used pre-built C++ exceptions. Thus, I created my own exceptions, which are simply typedefs to specific builtin exceptions. Because of the lazy approach, the exception names and the messages are not consistent between application-specific and core exceptions, but the exact number of exceptions are the same. Though the Corel team wasn't very cooperative, they have finally issued the release of version 7.0 (prior to this, v6.1 was the latest stable release) of their expensive, bloated and constantly updated X-Clone. Is it worth it?
